Race and gender are frequently seen as independent spheres of encounters which influence social, economic, and political aspects of oppression. Despite this, each of the categories overlaps, and cross each other, creating complex interactions. This concept is known as intersectionality. How one defines him or herself is greatly influenced by individual characteristics, family dynamics, historical factors, and social and political contexts (Tatum).

Intersectionality: the Cross Between Race and Gender ...
Intersectionality is relative because it displays how race, gender, and other components that operate as one to shape the experiences of others. Crenshaw used intersectionality to denote how race, class, gender, and other systems combine created intersectionality and shaped the experiences of many by making room for privilege (Crenshaw 1991).

Finally, several feminist criminologists have used intersectionality to theorize about the relationship between inequality and crime. For example, Richie (1996) shows how intersecting systems of race, class, and gender can lead battered Black women to commit criminal offenses. In her analysis, Richie uses the concept of gender entrapment to explain how “some women are forced or coerced into crime by their culturally expected gender roles, the violence in their intimate
